Divorce Lawyer in Moose Jaw Saskatchewan - There are a few distinct levels of court in Saskatchewan, each of which handles a different part of family law.

Interim orders for access, child support and custody could be obtained through both the Supreme Court and the Provincial Family Court. These are usually obtained at the start of the case and remain active until the proceedings have ended. Frequently, an interim order is awarded for one spouse to have complete ownership of a some family asset. With this, the individual is ordered to either sell the possession or to maintain possession of it.

Unfortunately, even with all the efforts being made by the Provincial Family Court and the Supreme court, family cases still take several months to conclude.
